EDITORIAL PRACTICE

The headings to these inventories have been standardized in their phrasing and layout. The names of the appraisors are given when they appear in the document. The names of rooms are printed in italic as a matter of course. The documents are numbered and arranged in chronological order by date of the document. If the document itself is not dated then the date of exhibition is used and in two cases the dates of the administrators' and executors' accounts. The year is given in New Style. Parts which have proved to be illegible, even under the ultra-violet lamp, are indicated by . . . , with no reference to or indication of the length of the illegible passage. The original spelling and capitalization of the body of the document has been preserved. All sums of money have been converted into arabic numerals. No attempt has been made to check or alter the totals, which in some cases are clearly wrong. The Glossary does not list all the variants of such words as Andirons or Valance. Spelling is still irregular at this period and is often phonetical, so that to read a word aloud can often provide the solution to its meaning.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Grants from the Twenty-Seven Foundation and from the Economic and Social Research Council towards the preparation of this volume are gratefully acknowledged. The interest and support of the General Editor of the Society, Dr. Eileen Scarff, have been of great value, while the skill and imperturbable good humour with which Mrs J.P. Hey prepared the typescript from my transcripts, often more illegible than the originals, are beyond praise.

INTRODUCTION

Probate inventories have long been recognised as among the most valuable of all surviving historical documents, both for the re-creation of almost every aspect of the daily lives of men and women from the early sixteenth century to the end of the eighteenth and for the flood of light that they throw on the operations of sixteenth and seventeenth century commerce, manufacture and agriculture and the growth of a consumer society.[1]

A probate inventory is a list of the personal possessions of a man, or a woman, compiled shortly after his death by appraisors, usually a small group of his neighbours. A number survive from the thirteenth century onwards, but they were first required by law following a statute of 1529,[2] and they continue to be compiled until the middle years of the eighteenth century and, in rapidly diminishing numbers, beyond. When the appraisors were careful and conscientious the result can be a detailed survey of the layout, furnishings and fittings of a man's house, the contents of his shop, the stock in his farmyard and the crops in his barns and fields in a way that is beyond the reach of almost every other contemporary document, bringing vividly to life the immediate environment in which the men and women of Tudor and Stuart England lived out their lives.

Probate inventories do, however, have their limitations, and limitations which their inherent interest and attractiveness must not be allowed to conceal. They are lists only of personal possessions, which means that they are not concerned with any land which might have been owned by the deceased, although they do include leasehold property. Nor do they list fixtures, hence the exclusion of the brass furnaces said to be 'affixed' in No. 44. These omissions mean that they can seriously underrate a man's total wealth. Further, it is not uncommon for an inventory to list only those possessions which remain after items specifically bequeathed by will have been distributed, something which becomes apparent only when the two documents are compared. In No. 137, however, items given away either by will or during the life-time of the deceased are listed. Thirdly, the accuracy of the prices given to the goods listed is open to question, and it should be noted that in No. 47 the goods are reported to have been sold for more than they were valued. Again, these factors can mean that a man's wealth may be under-estimated. Because of their nature they tend to be biased towards the better-off members of society, since the very poor would have had no personal possessions worth listing. Nonetheless, there is an extraordinary range of personal circumstances represented in the documents printed here, from the £17,000 left by Maurice Thompson of Haversham (No. 80) to the £5 of Henry Elburne, of Penn, bricklayer (No. 46). Finally, and less seriously, a probate inventory, of necessity, is made at the end of a man's life, when he may well be retired and may also have already disposed of a substantial part of his wealth to his children, especially on the occasion of their marriages, a not uncommon practice in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

Probate inventories survive in very large numbers for England as a whole, but unfortunately Buckinghamshire is less well endowed than counties such as Leicestershire, Suffolk and Norfolk. Nevertheless, even for Buckinghamshire, there are so many remaining, even for so short a period as that from 1660 to 1714, as to make selection essential. This volume contains 159 inventories, drawn from those once in the records of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury and now to be found in two classes in the Public Record Office, PROB 4 and PROB 5. Very many of the documents in PROB 4 have been seriously damaged by damp and at the time of writing only about a quarter of the total numbers of documents in this class is normally accessible to students. This volume contains all of those for the period from this part of the class which are legible, with one addition, No. 51, which was included because of its special interest. PROB 5, a much smaller class, contains inventories which have formed part of legal proceedings. All of those for the period which are legible are included here. Thus this volume contains all of the probate inventories relating to Buckinghamshire for the period 1660 to 1714 which were once in the records of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury and which are now both accessible and legible. None survive for Buckinghamshire in either class from before 1660.

The documents printed here are drawn from all over Buckinghamshire, but their coverage of the county is very haphazard, both geographically and chronologically. Thus there are several from Newport Pagnell, Olney and High Wycombe, but none from Aylesbury. There are seven for 1661, but none for 1693, 1697, 1701–1702, 1704–1705, 1707–1708 or 1710–1712. This uneven distribution prevents any convincing statistical analysis of their contents and means that they can only be used to illustrate by example the economy and the society of Restoration Buckinghamshire, with all the possibilities of error and exaggeration that this implies. Nevertheless, even with this reservation made, the evidence which they provide, both individually and collectively, is invaluable. Before this is discussed it is, however, necessary to set these documents in their broader regional and geographical context.

Buckinghamshire is very much an artificial administrative unit straddling two quite disparate natural regions.[3] In the north are a series of broad river valleys and generally low rounded hills. The soils are often heavy clays so that drainage, especially in the winter, can be a very serious problem. Some areas, particularly Whaddon Chase, were at the time of the Restoration still thickly wooded, but the Forest of Bernwood had been disafforested in the 1630s and this had been followed rapidly by the felling of the trees and the division of the land into closes of arable and pasture, a process all but complete by the end of the seventeenth century. Open field agriculture was common and usual, with large arable fields stretching to the parish boundaries, so that in parishes such as Padbury and Thornborough trees would have been few and far between. In many parishes in the north, however, enclosure of the open fields had been going on for centuries, and in Great Linford and Milton Keynes, for example, it was completed during the latter half of the seventeenth century.[4]

North and south Buckinghamshire are divided by the line of the chalk scarp of the Chilterns. The scarp itself faces north-west, and rises to over 800 feet in places. The dip slopes gently away to the south-east, being dissected by river valleys which are often dry. This leaves steep ridges pointing like fingers towards the Thames. The underlying geological structure of the Chiltern Hills is chalk, but this is frequently masked by thick deposits of clay with flints, making cultivation difficult and expensive.[5] In the hills themselves open field agriculture was almost unknown and fields were often small closes surrounded with thick hedgerows. Open field farming was, however, to be found on the level gravel terraces of the Thames valley, at Wraysbury, for example, and in level valley bottoms in the hills and along the scarp. Much of the Chiltern landscape was wooded, but this was often in the form of coppice woodland rather than standard timber, with scrub on the steep slopes, and much was also plantation rather than natural woodland.

It is very likely that there were fewer than 100,000 inhabitants in Buckinghamshire at the end of the seventeenth century. There were at least a dozen places deserving to be called towns, but by the standards of today they were small. High Wycombe was probably the largest, with perhaps under 2,000 inhabitants. Buckingham and Marlow may each have had 1,800, Newport Pagnell perhaps 1,600, Olney and Aylesbury about 1,400 each, and Amersham even fewer. It is unlikely that any other place in the county had a thousand inhabitants, whether Bletchley, Stony Stratford or Beaconsfield, whilst Slough was no more than a hamlet of inns and brickyards in Upton.

The very marked differences between north and south Buckinghamshire, differences due in the end to differences in underlying geological structures, are reflected in a very striking fashion in the probate inventories in this volume. The differences between town and country also impose their own divisions. Let us turn first of all to rural north Buckinghamshire.

There are in this volume less than forty inventories from which to analyse the agriculture of north Buckinghamshire in the last half of the seventeenth century, and so it is obvious that the documentary basis for the generalisations which follow is narrow in the extreme. Nevertheless, they are drawn from 22 villages and five towns, and so give a fair spread geographically. Those from the towns must be left on one side for the moment.

No probate inventory is without cattle, whether called cows, beasts, oxen, runts or milch kine, bullocks or beasts. There are sometimes very large numbers. Francis Dodgworth of Whaddon (No. 12) at the time of his death in 1662 had 321 cattle in all, worth £2,270. Thomas Marme of Quarrendon had 268 in 1700, worth £1,626 (No. 145). Some of these animals were being fattened, others were dairy cattle, and milkhouses, cheese chambers and cheeses are common items in the inventories. Indeed, Elizabeth Kislinbury, of Beachampton, who died in 1674 (No. 57), may have relied almost entirely for her living upon her single milch cow. She had 14 cheeses in her loft, and cheese-making, in an age of slow and uncertain transport, was certainly the best way to make use of surplus milk to advantage.

Only five inventories are without sheep. Again, flocks can be very large. Richard Barnwell, yeoman, of Willen, had at least 768 at the time of his death in 1671 (No. 43), and that Thomas Marme of Quarrendon, already mentioned, had at least 132. Robert Willison of Newton Longville had £90 in wool (No. 143), although unfortunately the numbers of his livestock, which were grazing in pasture grounds at Salden, are not given in detail.

Horses were widely kept — of necessity since they provided energy for transport and for ploughing. Some people had a substantial number. George Russell of Aston Abbots had 22, divided between cart and saddle horses (No. 101). Pigs were also widely kept, although in small numbers. That Richard Barnwell of Willen, already mentioned, had ten, but this is rather unusual. There are occasional references to poultry and to bees.

Animal husbandry is clearly of very great importance in north Buckinghamshire in the latter half of the seventeenth century, and it was working on an international scale. The region is crossed by a number of the drove roads along which Welsh drovers would have brought their cattle for fattening in the Home Counties prior to sale in Smithfield Market.[6] The Welsh Way, near Stowe, is still marked on the Ordnance Survey map, and cattle came not only from Wales but also from Ireland. That Francis Dodgworth of Whaddon, already mentioned, had 70 Irish runts worth £370 at the time of his death.

The cattle trade was clearly very valuable in the north of the county in the seventeenth century, and this brought considerable pressure to enclose land for pasture from the open arable fields. One of the anti-enclosure statutes of the end of the sixteenth century expressly excluded from its scope enclosures made within two miles of Watling Street and five miles of Dunstable for the benefit of drovers working their way from Chester to London.[7] Many of those small closes which still line Watling Street in Shenley, although strictly beyond the limits of the statute, almost certainly take their origins in this way. In spite of all that Commissions of Enquiry and statutes could do to check or to turn back the tide of enclosure, it was persistent and widespread throughout north Buckinghamshire, and only very few parishes were without some sixteenth and seventeenth century enclosure, whilst others, such as Great Linford and Milton Keynes, were entirely enclosed at this time. Some villages were almost or completely depopulated, Fleet Marston, Quarrendon and Pitchcott, for example, whilst in others important social changes took place. A rent book for Great Linford of 1714 shows eleven large farms, let at rents ranging from £56 to £193 18s. a year, a total of £1,048 10s., and twenty cottages paying in all a total of £23 8s. 8d.[8] There has clearly been a polarisation of large-scale tenant farmers, mostly graziers, on the one hand, and poor agricultural labourers on the other.

But north Buckinghamshire was not a specialised pastoral region. Arable husbandry was equally important. Wheat, barley and peas were the most important crops, followed by beans, and then oats, which does not seem to have been much cultivated. Open field agriculture was widely practised, although as far as the evidence allows us to judge, arable holdings were comparatively small. Thus Thomas Vere, yeoman, of Worminghall (No. 130), had at the time of his death in 1691 some 27 acres of wheat, beans and barley in the three fields of his village, worth £40, out of a total inventory of £1,010. In fact, three-quarters of his wealth, £750, was tied up in bonds and debts due to him. A great deal of seventeenth century agriculture, trade and commerce was run on credit, provided often in quite small sums, by more prosperous neighbours (see, for example, Nos. 15 and 150). By the end of the seventeenth century, as these inventories make clear, other openings for the investment of surplus money were beginning to appear (see Nos. 80 and 158).

Another probate inventory, that of Zacheus Wigg (No. 155), of Stewkley, who died in 1709, illustrates vividly one of the most important factors behind the enclosure movement of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, namely the monumental inconvenience of the open field system. His farm, and there is no indication as to how large it was, was divided into 94 separate pieces scattered through the open fields of Stewkley. The time and energy spent in walking from one strip to the next can only be guessed at.

There were two solutions to the problem: enclosure or increasingly detailed regulation to keep the system working reasonably smoothly, and it was a matter for each village community to make its own choice. At Sherington very detailed regulations were made in 1682, and field tellers, including a Mr. Chibnall, were appointed to see that they were obeyed.[9] Gawcott had a field bailiff, and Newport Pagnell appointed a field keeper for the Portfield in 1662.[10] He had to check encroachments, regulate gleaning, set the days for ploughing, sowing and harvest, and the dates when livestock could be turned into the stubble to graze. Nevertheless, in spite of its rigidity, there was room for innovation.[11] Root crops were being grown at Calverton in 1661 (No. 3), vetches at Brill in 1668 (No. 25). But real innovation could come only with enclosure, and the profits to be made from grazing cattle for the insatiable London food markets were tempting an increasing number of farmers in north Buckinghamshire in the seventeenth century to abandon the familiar, well-tested safety of the open field system and leap into the uncertainties of enclosure and possessive individualism, where the rewards, and the risks, were so much greater.

Let us now turn to the probate inventories from the south of the county. It is immediately apparent that there are important differences between north and south. Probate inventories from the Chilterns show very much smaller herds and flocks. The largest herd of cattle numbers only 23, and was in fact owned by a paper-maker of Horton (No. 78). Flocks of sheep were also smaller, the largest being 200 owned by a Saunderton yeoman (No. 109), in 1685, and much of his farm seems in fact to have lain north of the chalk scarp. Cheese seems to have been even more important in the south than in the north, and there is mention of potted butter (No. 61). Pigs are numerous, and at Burnham in 1680 they are actually called fatting pigs (No. 83).

Open fields were to be found in the Chilterns, but only where topography allowed, and they were often quite small. Thus a survey of Great Hampden made in 1653 records five common fields totalling 244 acres out of a total area for the manor of 2,253 acres, but more than half of these fields lay in two farms, one of 88 acres and another of 65 acres.[12] Ellesborough also had five open fields, but these lay in the Chiltern foothills, being enclosed early in the nineteenth century.[13] There were at least three at Denham at the beginning of the eighteenth century, and those of both Great and Little Marlow survived until well into that century. Away from these open fields, however, the landscape was one of small enclosures, interspersed with patches of woodland, heath and common. There was a great deal of piecemeal enclosure, clearing and grubbing up of trees, and also planting of woodland. Thus in 1664 Nether Chawley Field in West Wycombe was described as a close of 26 acres.[14] In 1670 Colly Hill Spring in Hedgerley was said to be lately grubbed up and converted to tillage,[15] and when the manor of Temple Bulstrode was sold in 1686 Lodge Field was said to be divided into two and the Great Sheep Field into four.[16]

There may have been little open field farming in the Chilterns but farms still had their lands divided up into small parcels. Thus Ballinger Farm in Great Missenden was composed in 1611 of 18 closes, of which the largest was 20 acres, the smallest an acre of meadow. These 18 closes were, however, fenced and hedged off from neighbouring lands, and many seem to have lain next to each other.[17] Arable farming was just as important in the Chilterns as it was in north Buckinghamshire, with wheat, barley, oats and peas the principal crops, but it was only rarely communally organised. This may have given more room for innovation, and the probate inventories for the south of the county would seem to confirm this. Vetches were being grown at Wendover, Hambleden, Amersham and Bledlow (Nos 27, 34, 63, 74), cinque foin at Chalfont St. Peter and Chesham (Nos. 41, 125) and grass seed is recorded at Bledlow (No. 74). Winter and spring sown corn are mentioned separately at Wooburn (8), Datchet (60), and Bledlow (74).

However, the most significant difference between north and south Buckinghamshire is to be found in the systematic exploitation of the Chiltern woodlands, especially when these woodlands are close to the Thames. Much of this woodland was exploited as coppice, in which the wood is cut at anything up to fifteen years old, sometimes more, and then allowed to shoot again from the roots, or stools, something which most English forest trees, whether ash, oak, beech, hazel or elm, will do quite happily almost indefinitely provided the young growth is protected from grazing animals. Oak and ash were as common as beech in the Chiltern woods at this time and all three were exploited for their wood, rather than for fully grown timber. When cut this coppice wood could be used for a wide variety of purposes. The wood bailiff at Shardeloes in 1693 was cutting broom staves, hop poles, hedgestakes, hurdle rods, axle trees, faggots and stackwood, for a salary of £20, which was, incidentally, three years in arrears.[18] The manufacture of brushes, brooms and wooden spoons in Chesham and of furniture in High Wycombe is based upon coppice wood of this kind. One of the most interesting probate inventories in this volume is that of Thomas Price, of Wendover, joiner, who died in 1673 (No. 51). In his workshop he had eleven bedsteads ready made up for London, worth £3 13s. 4d., and a further £6 in sawn wood framed and made out into bedsteads ready for London and already sent up there. In addition he had £10 in oak timber and boards, £4 in ash, and £5 in beech wood. Unfortunately, his inventory is incomplete, but there is sufficient to suggest an already well-established trade in furniture to London about which one would dearly love to know more. How were the beds transported, for example, and how and where were they sold?

In addition to its use in furniture, tools and implements of every kind wood was also extensively used as a fuel. Large quantities of stackwood, billets and faggots were sent down the Thames each year to London to be used as domestic fuel and to fire the London glass house furnaces.[19] Burnham, Wooburn, Medmenham, Marlow and Millend at Hambleden were all engaged in this trade. Thomas Butterfield, yeoman, of Wooburn, had in 1662 (No. 8) 2,443 loads of billet wood worth £610, £44 in faggots and £20 in ash hoops at the time of his death. He was both dealer and shipper, since he also had barges, tackle and barge ropes worth £90, and debts due to him amounted to £597. He was worth all together £1,715. Robert Moore, gentleman, of Marlow (No. 87) had in 1681 £30 in billet wood lying at the wharf. He also owned the Kings Head, the Bulls Head, the Bear and the Crown inns in Marlow. William Willmott, gentleman, of Fingest (No. 127) had in 1690 1,232 loads of beech billet wood at Millend Wharf, worth £160, a further 1,115 loads cut in his woods worth £89, and 79 stacks of stackwood. This trade in timber and wood and their products was clearly very valuable.

A further product of the woods and coppices of the Chilterns was mentioned in the inventory of Henry Reeve, gentleman, of Stoke Poges (No. 159). He died in 1714. He had 128 yards of bark in Bottomwaters wood in Stoke Poges, worth £5 6s. 8d. Bark, especially oak bark, was much valued by tanners, and it was stripped and sold separately as a matter of course whenever wood was felled.

We have spent some time looking at rural Buckinghamshire, both north and south, as reflected through the probate inventories in this volume. Both areas were essentially regions of mixed farming, with the emphasis in the north upon cattle and sheep grazing and in the south upon the exploitation of woodland resources, the differences owing much to underlying topographical features. It is clear that change is taking place: in the north the success of animal husbandry was compelling the enclosure of the open fields, in the south enclosure was permitting innovation in arable husbandry whilst the demand of London for wood made coppice woodland ever more valuable. It is undoubtedly the ever-growing demands of London for foodstuffs and raw materials of every kind that were the motivating reasons behind these changes.

We must now turn from the countryside to the towns of Restoration Buckinghamshire. By modern standards they were very small indeed. The fields, haystacks, middens and animals of the farmyard were never very far away, the harvest a topic of serious concern in a way which city dwellers of the late twentieth century find difficult to appreciate. But numbers of inhabitants alone is not a reliable guide as to whether or not a place is a town or a village. Instead it is better to look to function as a more reliable touchstone. A village becomes a town when a significant proportion of the working population are engaged in non-agricultural occupations, perhaps as many as a third. This means that two-thirds can still be engaged in agriculture, and this is a most important point. All the towns of Restoration Buckinghamshire, and there were about a dozen of them, gave employment to a significant number of non-agricultural workers. Thus in High Wycombe at the end of the seventeenth century there were booksellers, glovers, lace-makers, chandlers, musicians, paper-makers, physicians, a dancing master, grocers, mercers, fishmongers, ironmongers and scriveners.[20] It is occupations of these kinds which turn a village into a town.

This concern with the distinction between village and town may seem rather arid, but it is of the greatest significance. Towns are very much the engines of economic growth and change. They provide opportunities for occupational specialisation because their shops and markets provide the necessaries of life readily and cheaply, so that physicians, watchmakers, booksellers and dancing masters can concentrate on mending bodies, watches and books and teaching dancing steps without having to bother overmuch about growing corn and raising sheep. Towns are trading centres, both for goods and for services, and as such they provide a focal point for the surrounding countryside. The demand of their population for foodstuffs, raw materials and for people can stimulate change and innovation over great distances. It is very likely that a tenth of the population of England was living in London in the seventeenth century, and it certainly exercised a national 'pull', in its insatiable demand for food, manufactured goods and human beings, and many historians would suggest that this 'pull' was one of the critical factors behind the origin of the industrial revolution in this country.[21] No town in Buckinghamshire has ever exercised such a commanding role at national level, but at a local level they did. Newport Pagnell, Olney, Wendover, Marlow, Stony Stratford, Buckingham, Amersham and Winslow were genuine towns in that they provided a focal point for the exchange of a wide range of goods and services over a dependant hinterland, a hinterland which had no formal boundaries and which would vary in size according to what was being bought and sold. The networks thus created can be immensely complex. Thus William Chaplyn, steward to Sir Richard Temple at Stowe in the 1680s, writes of buying and selling livestock at the fairs at Brackley, Thame, Banbury and Coventry. He went to Boston, in Lincolnshire, for a man to make a duck decoy in the grounds at Stowe, and to London for wrought iron gates, rather than into Staffordshire.[22] He himself bought his clothes from Alexander Ethersey, a draper of Buckingham who died in 1706 (No. 150) since among a long list of debts due to Ethersey is a note that Mr. Chaplyn of Stowe owed £11 10s. Mr Ethersey in his shop at Buckingham had cloth from Kidderminster, Yorkshire and the West Country, tammycloth that had almost certainly been made in Wakefield and calico that in all probability had come from India. Buckingham as a town was an important focal point for a matrix of relationships, the complexities of which it is impossible now fully to unravel.

Nevertheless, because of their small size, the distinction between town and country in Restoration Buckinghamshire was by no means clear cut. It was normal and usual for townsmen to have a shop and also to have strips in the open fields and livestock. The burgesses of High Wycombe were grazing their cattle in the Rye as late as 1927.[23] Thus John Godfrey, cooper, of Stony Stratford (No. 138) had a workshop, a saw house, lathes, felloes and cooper's ware at the time of his death in 1698, but he also had forty acres under wheat, barley and peas in the fields and three and a half acres of meadow. William Smyth, yeoman, of Newport Pagnell, who died in 1682 (No. 95) had carts and ploughs in his yard, three horses, seven cows and 57 sheep. He had 24 acres in the tilth field, 19 in the breach field and 23 acres fallow — a conventional, classical three-field pattern. But he also had £84 in bone lace, £41 in lace thread and money in the house, and a total of £505 of debts owed to him. In other words he was a dealer in lace, much of his business being done on credit, just as much as he was a farmer.

The lines between town and country and between occupations were much less clearly defined at the end of the seventeenth century than they are at the end of the twentieth, and it is the ambiguities and ambivalences which make the social and occupational structures of Restoration England so interesting. Thus Edward Wyse, gentleman, of Eton (No. 102) had a working room with hammers, vices, muskets, guns and three cases of pistols. Josias Geary of Chesham, gentleman, who died in 1689 (No. 125) had a chamber in Clements Inn, but he also owned 26 pigs, had £58 in wheat and cinque foin in his barn and five acres of wheat growing. A Denham fisherman had boats and nets worth £2 10s. (No. 118), three cows and two calves. A wheelwright of Lacy Green (No. 149) had 2,327 spokes and 1,171 felloes in his yard, and some ash in Bledlow, but his husbandry goods — crops and livestock — were worth £29. Thomas Davis, gentleman, of High Wycombe, who died in 1679 (No. 77) had a working room and a clay house. That Alexander Ethersey, draper, of Buckingham, already referred to, died in 1706 leaving shop goods alone worth £507. In his shop he had silver lace and thread, buttons, flowered druggets, damask, shalloons, flannel, narrow and wide, linseys, cottons and kerseys, fustian and linen, and there is a long list of debts due but even Ethersey had a crop of grain in the fields worth £15. Nevertheless, there were townsmen in late seventeenth century Buckinghamshire who had severed almost every connection with the countryside: Abraham Axtell, mercer, of Chesham, who died in 1687 leaving personal possessions worth £1,352, (No. 117), Jeremiah Stevens, maltster, of High Wycombe (No. 122) who died in 1688 leaving goods worth £1,470, including just one cow worth £2, and William Wheeler, another maltster of High Wycombe, who died in 1677 leaving £1,380 in personal possessions (No. 70).

Townsmen of this kind are clearly very wealthy, and we must expect to find in most Buckinghamshire towns shopkeepers and tradesmen leaving personal possessions which will include their shop goods, stock-in-trade and debts due, running to several thousand pounds, and their shops and warehouses stuffed with goods and merchandise drawn from all quarters of the known world. Silvester Widmere, mercer, of Marlow, died in 1663 (No. 15). When those charged with making his inventory went into his shop and warehouse they found candles, thread, kerseys, broad cloth, bays, perpetuanas, red flannel, grey serge, tammies, shalloons, calico, druggets, dimities, black Dutch serge, cottons, canvas, Holland linen, Scotch cloth, stockings, cotton hose, sugar, raisins, pipes, paper, nails, earthenware in a pot loft, black coat buttons, nine pairs of rusty scissors, quicksilver, Valencia almonds, rose water, prunes, currants, two dozen of wine glasses, pepper, tobacco, dates, ribbon, hops, soap, tennis balls and fish hooks. Here is the return cargo that the bargemasters of Marlow, Henley, Burnham, Wooburn (see No. 8), Pangbourne and so on brought back with them, having taken timber, grain, cheese and malt to London. They also brought back sherry, claret, brandy and Rhenish wines, as the inventories of innkeepers show, as well as coal, which also appears in a number of inventories.

Much of this trade was financed on credit. Shopkeepers often extended credit in very small sums to local people, as the list of debts to Nos. 15 and 150 show, this last one also revealing Browne Willis owing £2 19s. to his Buckingham tailor. But much trade was also at the wholesale level, where the sums of money involved were much larger. The inventory of Edward Parratt, No. 20, an Amersham maltster, illustrates something of the complexity and the scale of his commercial connections with London brewers.

Agriculture and commerce are only two of the facets of the total economy of Restoration England. Buckinghamshire is a county which is rarely associated with the early stages of industrialisation. It lacks the mineral deposits which, even during the period covered in this volume, were already being exploited with such dramatic effect in the north-east of England and in the Black Country. But coal-mining and iron-making were, geographically, isolated and uncommon phenomena, and they were at the same time enmeshed in an incredibly complex matrix of agricultural, manufacturing and commercial activities of which there is plenty of evidence in the inventories printed here. The long lists of the contents of kitchens and butteries in, for example, Nos. 15, 57, 116, 127 and 128, with their pots and pans, skillets, kettles, tin candlesticks, brass and pewter wares of every kind, reveal in vivid detail the ultimate destinations of the goods produced by the ironmasters of the Stour valley, whilst the prices given, lath nails were 14d. a thousand and pins 6d. a thousand, show how successful they were and how commonplace such articles had become by this date.

Restoration Buckinghamshire was more than simply a market for goods manufactured elsewhere. There were already in the county well-established manufactures of more than local importance. Paper-making had begun in the county by the opening years of the seventeenth century,[24] and two inventories, Nos. 78 and 156, provide evidence of the scale on which this industry was operating. Secondly, the inventory of a Slough brickmaker, No. 99, shows a business being carried on from two sites, one in Slough and the other at Cowley, in Middlesex, with some 268,000 bricks in various stages of manufacture, worth in all no more than £63 14s. At the time of his death, 1684, the rebuilding of London after the Great Fire was in full swing. Some at least of these bricks would have found their way into the new houses then being built. Thirdly, there is the surviving fragment of the inventory of a Wendover joiner, No. 51, printed here although out of sequence in the archival group, because of what it reveals about an already well-established furniture trade with London, whilst No. 148 provides evidence of what must have been a comparatively short-lived iron wire manufacture in Wooburn.

Paper, bricks and beds may lack the glamour of the iron and textile industries but their contribution to the overall pattern of economic activity in Restoration England should not be under-estimated. This economic activity was supported and sustained by the farmers, yeomen and husbandmen whose inventories form the bulk of this collection. Already, in spite of short-term difficulties and problems, they were providing more than enough grain and animal products to feed themselves, their neighbours and the shopkeepers, craftsmen and merchants of more distant villages and towns, and especially London, whose insatiable demand for foodstuffs of every kind provided the stimulus for the changes in farming practices which are so conspicuous a feature of seventeenth century Buckinghamshire. Some farmers were clearly very 'prosperous' (Nos. 37, 43, 130, 145) and their profits kept their houses well-stocked with furniture, linen and domestic utensils of every kind, bought from the shopkeepers of Marlow, Chesham and Buckingham, whose inventories in their turn reveal in astonishing detail just how sophisticated consumer-orientated supply and demand was at this period, [25] whilst an inventory such as No. 28, that of a prosperous Chesham craftsman, shows just how comfortable a milieu could be created from the goods then available.

The agricultural profits which were creamed off as rents often went into conspicuous consumption: the silk clothing, gilded furniture and landscape paintings listed in the inventories of Sir John Borlase (No. 124), Montague Drake at Shardeloes (No. 140), the deer in the park of Robert Dormer at Dorton (No. 133), and the new building at Gayhurst, hinted at in the inventory of John Digby (No. 53).

Finally, agricultural profits were the ultimate source of the money loaned out, for whatever purpose, and secured by bonds, bills and mortgages (for example, No. 146), for the money invested in the East India Company, the Guinea Company and Bank of England stock (Nos. 80 and 158), and the schemes of Alderman Bathurst (No. 80). They also supported the fellows of Oxford colleges, (Nos. 24 and 109), and the quiet life of Gregory Thornedall, gentleman, of Eton, a member of His Majesty's Chapel Royal, with his fishing rod and basket, his box of musical songs 'of noe vallue' and his Theorbo lute (No. 45).

This Introduction can scarcely begin to explore the riches to be found in the documents printed in this volume. Their value for whole areas of Restoration life can only be suggested: vernacular building, domestic furnishing, social and family relationships, on which see No. 151, are examples, and there are of course yet further areas which lie entirely beyond their scope, crime and poverty for instance, but as a microcosm of the daily life of ordinary men and women in the second half of the seventeenth century, they are unique among historical documents in their range, depth and detail.
